You and your loved ones are at risk of becoming victims of new crimes that are growing out of control, without being counteracted at all by law enforcement.

The crimes involve various forms of organized stalking and electronic harassment, or repeated assault and battery with directional energy weapons (a.k.a. “electronic weapons”). These crimes might sound too sinister, high-tech, or pointless to be happening in our society, but they are. You may not know about the crimes, because they’re very difficult for bystanders to witness, and offenders can perpetrate the crimes without leaving behind much actionable forensic evidence. In other words, these are covert crimes. This makes it easy for offenders to keep law enforcement in the dark about the crimes. It also makes it easy for police officers and elected officials who do know about the crimes to pretend they’re not happening, so they don’t have to deal with these complex criminal issues.

What do we know about these new crimes?

We know that thousands of people worldwide have alleged that they’ve been repeatedly stalked and harassed by large groups of offenders, who are mostly unknown to the victims. We know this because we hear the victims’ stories on nightly support calls and in countless videos posted to the Internet. We find no reason not to take the general thrust of their allegations seriously. Some plausible accounts of contract stalking, community stalking, and other forms of organized stalking have even made it into the mainstream media (ABC News, 2014; Shlonsky, 2016; Farrow, 2017).

From January to June, 2006, the U.S. Dept. of Justice conducted a national survey in which 65,270 people were asked whether they had been stalked during the previous twelve-month period (Baum et al., 2009; Catalano, 2012). Extrapolated to the total U.S. population at the time, an estimated 447,000 Americans aged 18 years and older reported being stalked by three or more offenders simultaneously. An estimated 52,000 people reported being stalked by 10 – 50 offenders in the same bout of stalking. When survey participants who reported being stalked by three or more offenders were asked if the stalkers “acted as a team or group”, 41.2% of survey participants responded “Yes” (U.S. Dept. of Justice, 2006). Moreover, a former Senior Special Agent-in-Charge of the Los Angeles Field Office of the FBI wrote an affidavit in 2011, commenting on the surveillance, organized stalking, and harassment of U.S. citizens by rogue criminal groups with illegal access to resources of law enforcement and the U.S. intelligence agencies (Gunderson, 2011).

If you search the Internet for the term “electronic harassment”, it will be readily apparent that thousands of individuals have also alleged being repeatedly harassed and assaulted with some kind of directional energy-emitting technology. Many of these victims report that the energy used in the assaults instantaneously produces a correlated suite of symptoms, potentially including sharp thermal pains, torturous electrified sensations, inflammation, vibratory sensations, induced muscle twitching, dizziness, nausea, blurred vision, and a host of other deleterious health effects. The majority of victims describe an audible component to the energy assaults (often a high-pitched ringing sound), just like the documented victims of the so-called “sonic attacks” on U.S. diplomats serving in Cuba and China (C-SPAN, 2018; Kuo, 2018). The Wikipedia page on “electronic harassment” fails to draw a possible connection between the prior allegations of thousands of ordinary citizens and the documented energy-weapon attacks on U.S. diplomats in Cuba and China. This makes one wonder if the editor of the Wikipedia page has a biased interest in suppressing this fairly obvious potential connection.
